About the show: The MercyCast is a podcast dedicated to learning the subtle art of compassion through the adversity of everyday life. Join Raleigh Sadler, the host, as he has honest and thought-provoking conversations with friends he has met along the way.

Potential questions (provided to Raleigh):

1. What moment or realization led you to write Forgive Me If I Was Rude?

2. You built your approach into a framework called AEAA: Affirmation, Empathy, Ask, Answer. How did you land on those four steps?

3. The book's central premise is that boldness and grace aren't opposites — that the goal isn't to win an argument but to win a heart. How did you land on that framework?

4. You describe conversations about faith today as happening in a different climate than the one you grew up debating in. How has that shift changed the way you approach these conversations?

5. Each chapter ends with a "Curious Conversations" feature modeling a dialogue between a believer and a skeptic. Why was it important to show that process step-by-step rather than just explain it?

6. Your background spans hip-hop, ministry, and formal apologetics training at Oxford. How do those different worlds inform how you talk to people who disagree with you?

7. What's the difference between defensiveness and curiosity in a hard conversation, and how does someone practice shifting from one to the other?

8. A chapter titled "But Nobody Asked You" gets at something a lot of believers feel. When is it actually your place to speak up, and when is restraint the more faithful move?

9. What would you say to someone who wants to have these conversations but is afraid of getting it wrong?

10. What do you hope readers take away from this book that they can use in their next hard conversation?
